Throughout the United States and particularly in urban Florida, we have entered a design age of the new renaissance of town planning. While we spent our childhoods escaping from the city to a network of suburban communities, the newest trend is returning to downtown areas and reinventing them to a network of neighbors, sidewalks, street cafes, theatres, shops and night life.

Fairfield Gardens, City of Boca Raton

While new towns and new urbanism can work beautifully on paper, the larger reality of community design is to develop infill design in the context of built environments with layers of restrictive zoning laws. We must examine the comp plans regarding housing, retail, economic resources and the concept of developing safe streets and neighborhoods. We are experienced in leading design charettes and working alongside the city commissioners and planning departments, as well as future developers, to create an ever changing blend of community that promotes infill housing and a future of livable urban communities.
